

Introduction to Philosophy

Final Presentation

Do a 3-minute oral presentation about your organize an activity experiment in philosophy in front of me and your classmates. That 3 minutes should include time for you to introduce and present the 1-minute video you created for your organize an activity final report.

Here's What I Want You to Do

You will create a PowerPoint slide deck that you will present to the class. In doing so, you should draw on the materials from your report for your organize an activity experiment in philosophy.

You are free to organize your final presentation as you see fit, but be sure to include the following items:

- A. Your one-minute video that showcases your activity. (Just play the video as part of your 3 minutes. You may play it at any point during your presentation—pick a moment that makes sense to do so.)
- B. What you did for your project and its impact (both intended and realized).
- C. Documentation (especially any photos and other imagery) of your activity. (You do not need to include everything, just enough to help make your presentation more dynamic and interesting.)
- D. A short reflection on how the activity your organized is connected to the course material.

Here's Why I Want You to Do It

I am having you do this final presentation because it has you...

- Develop your communication skills,
- Cultivate your curiosity about the work of others, and
- See that your work (and the work of your classmates) matters.

Here's How It Will Be Graded

Your final presentation will be assessed according to the following criteria:

1. Capturing and maintaining the audience's attention.
2. Describing the project and its impact.
3. Making connections to the course material.
4. Possessing crystal clear organization and contents that are easy to understand.
5. Demonstration of preparation and practice.
6. Responding thoughtfully to audience questions.
7. Asking interesting questions of the other presenters.

Collaboration & Academic Integrity

While you may have organized an activity with some classmates, you still must do your own presentation that is distinct from those of your other team members. In doing that, just be sure to primarily focus on your own individual contribution to the entire project along with your own personal reflections.

This activity is based upon a similar one from Ramona Ilea and Monica Janzen. I highly encourage you to visit their website on Engaged Philosophy (<https://www.engagedphilosophy.com>) for much more!

Final Presentation (Continued)

Above all, please be honest if you do receive any outside assistance or use the ideas of others. This includes using AI tools. In any of those cases, be sure to let me know what assistance you received, and I will let you know how to properly acknowledge that assistance in accordance with standards of academic integrity.